Values are two general kinds. Some values refer to what are known as 'end states'. These values are conditions in our own lives or in the entire world that we hope will come about.

Other values have to do with the way people should behave. Examples of these are honesty, kindness and sharing. But these are only words. What makes these words into values for you is that you believe they stand for a good way for people to behave and make for good conditions for people to live under.

Some values are personal. Personal values are those that are important in one's lives. No two people are exactly alike, nor are their values. One person may value quiet activities such as reading, watching television or talking to friends. Another person may have active pastime such as bicycling, playing basketball or swimming. Many people value both quiet activities and active ones, each kind at a different time.

Then there are societal values. A society's are those held by nearly every person in that group. The values are those held by nearly every person in that group. These values are found in the basic documents of the country such as its law and constitution. There are many social values. An example is equality. Others are hard work, freedom and good education.

When we are very young we look at our parents, teachers, relatives and religious leaders to point out values to us. When we grow we decide for ourselves. In the end we have to make up our minds about the values that are to be a part of our lives.

A difficult problem can arise when two of our values conflict with each other. For example, we believe in 'respecting one's parents'. On the other hand, we may believe in never breaking a trust. What if a brother or a sister told you they have disobeyed a parent?

Make notes with suitable abbreviations. Also give the title. 5 marks
